Body in Washington Identified as James E. Stansbury by Mark on Laundry.

M. J. Lawlor, who lives in $11 East Clay Street, last night identified the man who committed suicide in the Capitol grounds in Washington yesterday morning as his father-in-law, James E. Stansbury, a butcher, of Richmond Stansbury killed himself with a revolver, shooting himself through the temple. A telegram to Richmond yesterday informed the Police Department that the suicide had on, at the time of his death, clothes made in Richmond, and the Folice Department at once started to work to identify him.

Among his clothes Mr. Stansbury had on a start with the laundry mark T-120, which was found to be the mark used on his clothing by the Richmond Steam.

Fake Electric Wire Tied to Foot of "Statue in Armor."

The laugh is on Electrical Inspector Speights. In a Broad Street show window for some days there has been an advertising device—a figure in armor which went through certain stiff motions to the amazement of the crowd. Mr. Speights came along and gazed. His eagle eye caught an electric wire attached to the foot of the statue. "Ah!" he cried. "Working one of these theatrical electrical devices without a license—no wonder the Fire Department needs more men to keep down the insurance rates, when electric current is handled by amateurs, and whest tied to a suit of metal armor like that." So displaying his inspector's badge, he marched into the store for an interview with the proprietor. Just as he entered a small door opened in the back part of the suit of armor and a man stepped out. The wire tood to the foot was a blind, and the inspector beat a hasty retreat amid ens, Suppose you had a nice, big cat, the manner of the prodigal, only Jim Crow was not that kind.
